Ammonium Diuranate Precipitation with Anhydrous Ammonia L. C. Farrell, L. F. Grill, 1959 Ammonium diuranate has been precipitated from nitric acid solutions by the addition of anhydrous ammonia on both laboratory and production scales. This process produced more dense and more rapidly filtered precipitates than those formed by the addition of aqueous ammonia or slurried calcium hydroxide. The filtrates from the anhydrous ammonia process were lower in uranium content than those obtained by the addition of the other reagents. Processing equipment and precipitate characteristics are discussed.

Ammonia and Ammonium Compounds (Classic Reprint)

R. Arnold, 2015-09-27 Excerpt from Ammonia and Ammonium Compounds Notwithstanding the existence of the Handbooks of Lunge and Fehrmann, I have ventured, at the request of the publishers, to treat of the present position of the Ammonia industry in this little work. I have also found it necessary to include a description of the treatment of the spent-oxide from the coal-gas purification - an industry which is intimately related to the foregoing, and of which no connected description has as yet been published. The book may therefore be regarded as an attempt to collect descriptions of all the processes necessary for the utilization of the nitrogen present in coal. I have omitted mentioning obsolete views, even when still held by certain chemists and others, the object of the work being to portray briefly the present position of the two above-named industries, both of which are so closely connected with the coal-gas manufacture. To remedy a want in the present literature on this subject, I have given special attention to the analysis of the final products, and also of the raw material and other substances required in the various processes. Should these methods, which are based upon practical experience, prove acceptable, a step will have been taken in the direction of unity in analytical methods, which result is greatly to be desired in this as in other industries. Also included are two BASIC computer programs which allow the calculation of solubilities at any temperature.
