John Jacob Worthington Jones Billie

Houston,2015-08-05 In 1935 John Jones is an unrepentant hobo and con-man whose past has caught up with him. He is being carted off to jail when a strange young woman with a two-year-old child on her hip stops the police chief, insisting there has been a mistake. The man the officer has in tow is her husband, Reverend John Jacob Worthington Jones. Edith Harvey needs a man with nothing to lose. Who better than someone at odds with the law? She says a short prayer, and tells a little lie. The domino effect of her hasty falsehood sets in motion a chain of unexpected events that will change her life forever.

Cabin 12 John Bishop, 1978 The place is a motel in a small Virginia town, where a father and son have come to make funeral arrangements for their son and brother. He was a truck driver, formerly a star high school athlete, who was killed when his rig jackknifed on the highway. As they talk about him, and his life, the possibility that perhaps his death was not accidental at all begins to emerge. Gradually the tension between the two men builds, interrupted at one point by an explosive confrontation with a noisy couple in the next room and while they are united in their grief the gap of communication between them, their differing perception of the dead son and brother, is increasingly evident. In the end we know that the death was not an accident but an escape--fleeing from the disappointment and failure which still infuse the lives of the family left behind.--
